LOST ALL NICHT ON A MOUNTAIN

Lawyer Charles B. Reid Returns to Tell of His Awful Experience on Stony Squall, in British Columbia.

grows street, who was lost a month ago in the wilds of the British Colum bla's National Park, near the town of Bempff returned to New York to-day inclined to make light of his thrilling experience.

He was lost from 3 o'clock one day until 11 the next. All those hours he had no water, although he could hear the tormenting gurgle of a stream far down the side of Stony Squall, a 6,000 foot brother of Cascade mountain, which rears its head into the clouds 12,-000 feet above sea level.

Reid and his brother-in-law, Orlin M. Sandford, a general agent of the Equigone half way and turned back. That's how he got lost.

ening World reporter, who found him in his office, stained by travel and garbed in the clothes of the rough West: "it's not-true that I was playing tag with mountain goats out there and that when I got lost that I became delirious, and when the searching party same after me I thought they were In dians and fled from them in fear. We New Yorkers can talk about our yelpapers and all that sort of thing.

"It was a very foolish thing for Mr Banford, my brother-in-law, and myself derfoots, we thought we knew it all, and the mountains looked so near that the first day we landed at Bampff we thought we'd climb it and get back in time for dinner.

Kept Warm and Comfortable.

"I kept myself warm and comfortable, but how I wanted a drink of water. I couls hear a stream gurging away down the mountain side, but I chewed a pebble rather than run the chance of trying to find that water. It was the uncertainty of it all that deterred me from trying. It's bad enough groping around out there with sun overhead, without taking a chance at night. I had had nothing to eat since breakfast, and I can tell you I was pretty hungry.

"The sun-came up at 5 o'clock, and I took the trail again and about 10 o'clock came out on the western slope of Stony Squall and found the road that leads to Bampff. I met a man with three ponies and he told me that a rescue party was out after a tenderfoot. I told him I guessed I was the possum. I got back to the hotel and—

"What was the first thing you did?"
"I ordered three meals in one and I ate," and the thought of that triple-wpanison repost made Mr. Reid's eyes 10ft. He will never forget it.

"A scout was sent out for the rescuers, and about 1 o'clock they came trailing home, and I met them and said, 'How d'ye do?' and they were all glad to see me, but they didn't say so in polite language. You know they don't call a spade a diamond out West, and they talked about cussed tenderfoots and the crazy things most of them did. Of course it was all impersonal, but I understood.

Search Party Led Astray.

"The search party had been led astray by the moun. The high had been led astray by the moun. The high had been cloudy and every incite while it would let the moon look out. The rays fell on a big rock on the western side of Stony Squail and the reflection was taken for my camp-fre. They found out their mistake when they found the rock."

Reid was quiet for a few minutes, and looked down from his fourteenth story window into the street, where the crowds looked like little files of ants going back and forth.

"That's a pretty nice country out there," said the lawver, turning again to the reporter. "No, it isn't: li's grand. Big. open, free! It's hard to come back here and become one of the mob down there in the chasm," and he nodded toward the street.

According to Joe Finnegan, of St Louis, who hopes to back Richard Mansfield off the boards with his proege of the diamond, this drama is "rich in its pathos, sensational in story, thrilling in situation, romantic in incident; every scene a climax, and the most strenuous and daring plece of human deviltry in all the records of crime."
